Intro Two: Original

Wayne Williams, accused Atlanta child murderer, continues to maintain his innocence, even after 30 plus years in Prison. In episode 4 of Atlanta Monster, there were several differing perspectives of Williams coming from the police, family members of the victims, citizens of Atlanta, and the black community. The detectives of the case strongly believed that Williams was the murder, even though he was not on the suspect list prior to being pulled over on the bridge. In opposition to that, family members of the children were not sold on the fact that Williams was to blame, some of them even claim that they know the real murder. "He was at the wrong place at the wrong time," a statement used frequently by those who knew Williams. In discussing episode 4, Gemini , there will be arguments that will be agreed and disagreed on as well. While it can be agreed that Williams' may have been guilty of the murders Cater and Payne, there is not enough evidence to agree that he killed the children from the Atlanta child murders.

Intro Two: Revised

Wayne Williams, the accused Atlanta child murderer, continues to maintain his innocence, even after thirty plus years in prison. Episode four of Atlanta Monster presents several differing perspectives of Williams coming from the police, family members of the victims, and the black and white communities. The detectives of the case strongly believed that Williams was the murderer, even though he was not on the suspect list prior to being pulled over on the James Jackson Parkway Bridge. In opposition, family members of the children were not convinced that Williams was to blame, and some of them even claimed that they knew the real murderer. Those who knew Williams well frequently said, “He was at the wrong place at the wrong time.” Episode four, “Gemini,” offers contradictory arguments that confuse the audience. Although Williams was convicted for the murders of Cater and Payne, not enough evidence exists to charge him with the remaining Atlanta child murders.
